Our core text.

Into a forest of fifty thousand trees rode a lone traveller. Suddenly he found himself inside a wonderful palace. He called, "Hello, is anybody there?" but none came so he sat down and ate a marvellous meal and slept in a feather bed. He stole a rose for his daughter, Beauty.

A voice rasped, "You have plundered my house."

The traveller, Gregor, saw a hideous beast and cried, "Don't kill me – I'll give you anything you want."

The Beast listened to him and said, "Bring me your daughter, she is the price!"

Gregor rode home and told his daughters about his promise. Beauty said, "A promise is a promise." So, she rode through the forest to the Beast's castle.

Every morning she found presents and flowers from the Beast ... but no Beast. Finally, she saw him and he asked, "Am I the ugliest sight you ever saw?" but Beauty was kind and sweet and made friends with the Beast.

The Beast asked, "Do you hate me for keeping you here?"

"No," said Beauty.

The Beast said, with tears in his eyes, "That is why you are called Beauty."

Beauty missed her family but the Beast didn't want her to go home. She promised to come back but when she got home she stayed longer and longer away from the Beast.

Inside the castle the Beast became sicker and sicker.

Beauty screamed, "Beast, Beast. Don't die. I'm coming. Wait for me!"

Faster than snow falling from a roof Beauty ran back to the palace garden where Beast lay as still as death.

She cried, "I loved you Beast, I loved you!"

The Beast changed into a young Prince. He said, "I was under a spell and you have saved me."
